

Highlights of the Week

Apart from Mufti today (so much excitement!) the highlight of this week has to have been writing stories linked to the crimes of Kissing Kate Barlow. I have been so impressed with the sentence construction and description that has been included in their stories and I know they are all rightfully proud of the results.

In Maths we have practiced column addition, subtraction and multiplication every day (continued practise during Half Term would be brilliant if you feel like making up a few questions!) but during the main part of the lessons we have been working on long division. This needs continued work for many of the children but progress has definitely been made.

In Science we have completed our unit on systems within the human body and next term we will be moving onto Light. In PSHE we looked at how beneficial a growth mindset can be compared to a fixed mindset.

Homework

I'm not giving back the Homework folders over half term as I haven't had time to thoroughly mark last week's work and I want to be able to identify any areas we need to continue to work on. Instead, everyone should be ready to quiz on the first Monday back so lots of reading please. Most of you were also given advice on other things to look at over the holidays (e.g. writing emails / stories or looking through the SATs papers) as well as TTRS, Spellingframe.co.uk. and BBC Bitesize Grammar.
